Svend Helms' work offers a fascinating exploration of the lost city of Jawa, an ancient, ruined city that lies in the basalt desert of northeast Jordan - a desolate region swept by sandstorms, where temperatures vary through extremes. Today only Bedouin venture across the Black Desert, but five thousand years ago Jawa thrived there briefly as an urban center of considerable complexity. Discovered by aviators in 1931, Jawa's ruins were only recently excavated. Strangely, the harsh environment has protected the city - no settlement was ever built upon Jawa's ruins - making it the best preserved Bronze Age city yet known. Helms was director of excavation at the twenty-two acre site.

By Gus Gintzburger

Outstanding study of how - long ago - very long ago (the Bronze age?) - people would live and survive in the Desert - developing water harvesting techniques with an incredible energy and know-how. This study was done without the now available help of the modern Remote Sensing and Geographic Information System - Helms and collaborators are presenting here a fascinating account with numerous drawings, hypothesis - possible explanation of the life-support systems with details of (the possible) material requirement and labour-time to build and maintain the water harvesting structures at Jawa in the black basalt desert of North-Eastern present Jordan- a unique contribution to understanding how water harvesting techniques work in the desert ! a "must read" for all people working these days on water harvesting techniques and desert development.
