Review

"Over the last three decades, Prem Chowdhry has established herself as a major authority on the political economy and social history of Haryana state in northwest India. This collection of her essays brings a gender perspective to bear on the dynamics of economic development, social transformation and political democratization in the region, exploring the contradiction whereby one of the most prosperous states in the country is also characterized by the violent enforcement of patriarchal and caste-based social norms."-- Patricia Uberon, Honorary Fellow, Institute of Chinese Studies, Delhi

"Prem Chowdhry's work has always been remarkably wide ranging in its scope...intensely researched as well as acutely analytical in its presentation....She has...the striking ability to trace broad historical patterns down to their present manifestations...[and] has been as much a historian of colonial times as of contemporary ones. This volume will be something that all historians and [scholars of] cultural studies...will enjoy reading and learn from."--Tanika Sarkar, Professor of Modern History, Centre for Historical Studies, Jawaharlal Nehru University, New Delhi

"This set of field-work based, archivally-rich reflections...[is a] deeply moving, analytically sharp account of a troubled land, where women are a major workforce as they move around freely, but enveiled; where widows and daughters' share in land is asserted as it is sought to be circumscribed by family heads; where marriages break the bounds of caste, as independent young couples are hunted and pilloried by purveyors of community and familial honour....This is layered gendered history in the long-run--and at its best."--Shahid Amin, Professor of History, University of Delhi

Political Economy of Production and Reproduction presents a nuanced understanding of social flux and cultural turmoil in contemporary north India. It critically examines the complex relationship of the colonial past with the present; the shifts in the political economy and culture of north India; and the constant reformulation and refashioning of patriarchal forces.

Prem Chowdhry, who has worked for close to three decades in the area, presents an intensive case study of Haryana that spans the mid-nineteenth to the twenty-first century, exploring its politics, economy, and society, with special emphasis on caste and gender. She offers a rich assessment of colonial legacy in the region, and how and why post-colonial changes in India--which established political democracy and norms of social equality--stand severely diluted and compromised indicating high economic and low social indices.

Mapping significant social process and state policies that have shaped and reshaped north India, Political Economy of Production and Reproduction provides an insight into one of the richest regions in India and why it continues to be regressive even in the twenty-first century--ruled by social forces determined by caste, custom, and community, instead of moving towards a modern egalitarian society and statehood.
